Construction Business Practice Group: An Overview

As one of the leading indicators of the economy's future direction, contractors and construction companies are often the first to experience the negative effects of an economic downturn. Conversely, an uptick in new projects can often signal better days ahead for their entire industry – and for the nation's business climate as a whole.

The challenge is to anticipate the ups and downs of the business cycle as far in advance as possible. And to combine good planning with financial discipline so that your company will retain its value and market share whichever way the economic winds blow.

RBF's clients in the construction and contracting sectors benefit from our deep understanding of the many ways the laws of taxation and business can be used to their advantage. Our experience in business strategy, job estimating and costing, financing, taxation and government regulation provides builders and contractors with the right breadth of service to meet their needs – both for today and for the future.

Some specific ways we help our construction industry clients:

- Setting up WIP systems to determine percent of completion
- Dealing with bonding companies, surety underwriters and banks
- Allocation and capitalization of costs under IRS Sec 263(A) and Sec 460(C)
- Understanding "look back" rules and their specific applications
- Creating project-tailored job costing systems
- Securing financing from traditional and non-traditional sources

But that's only part of the story.

For a more specific description of these and other accomplishments on behalf of our construction clients, please call Bill Rucci, CPA, MST, CGMA at (781) 321.6065, ext 116 or email billr@rbfpc.com.
